

I have been a XM subscriber for 2 years. They have provided a very entertaining and valuable service. As a Professional Driver having the ability to maintain a consistent radio signal is a valuable asset to. The recent addition of the local weather and traffic information channels helps me greatly in my daily drive planning not to mention being another safety tool. I do not feel the FCC needs to intervene with this service. It does not effect the daily listener on the local stations, it is no different than cable TV service having the weather channel. If I am paying for the XM service the FCC needs to worry about more serious matters than something like this. XM is a good honest service that millions of Americans pay for and enjoy. And should be left alone.

Faithfully submitted
Raymond Britain